CONTENTS: Statistical data shows that the number of registered disabled, unemployed and receiving benefits in Austria, steadily increased from 2000 to 2013. In 2010, the cost of supporting this group amounted to 1.3 billion Euros. This study investigates how the Republic of Austria, using the Mol as an example, combats this unemployment, and what success has been achieved. This should provide an insight into possible ways out of the current situation. The problem results in the following research questions: What employment tools and measures, favouring registered disabled, have been implemented since 2000 by the Mol? What impact have these measures made on registered disabled workers from the perspective of elected representatives of disabled persons and of affected employees?

In addition to a research of literature, the experiences of elected representatives of disabled persons in the Mol and those of affected employees were used for this research. With the help of a structured questionnaire, the views of people with experiences in this area were obtained. The findings were combined with the outcome of the literature research and are incorporated in the conclusion of the book.

The results show that far too few provisions and measures were implemented for the employment of registered disabled persons between 2000 and 2013 due to budget cuts, but also because of the "fear of contact". Only when "the mission statement of all federal ministries provides for the inclusion of registered disabled people" we can hope that the employment situation of the affected group will improve, at least slightly. This is why the author, also using firsthand knowledge, proposes a number of potentially controversial measures as a remedy for the current situation, even though he is aware that his proposals might meet with disapproval.
